

a. ימים מיוחדים: we had two the entire summer

1. Yom Olam: This day consisted of the campers being divided into groups and given a country affiliation. The campers made their own passports, costumes, cheers, etc. They then went through a rotation of stations each station consisting of learning and activities about each country specifically Jewish life and Jewish history in that country (the countries were: Argentina, Italy, Spain, Greece and Morocco) then the countries competed against one another in a giant version of tag invented by Rachel Bountiouto (I do not remember the specifics of the game but many games would work) after dinner we ended the day so that we could have play rehearsal.
2. Yom Shishim: sixties day was a very good day of both fun and education, my biggest critique would be that the education and the fun were not so integrated. In the morning we had the campers go through a number of discussion and text study groups centered around 60's type themes (women's lib., racism, Conservative Judaism, Unions) then after lunch we all tie-died clothing. We were supposed to have a big naval battle type thing (ala the Vietnam war) but there was a giant rainstorm (and a camper having a seizure of some kind) and the counselor in charge had not planned anything so after the rainstorm we had some free time in the agam and then a non-related peulat erev. The day was overall nice but could have used more integration as well as some better planning out of the activities later in the day.
